

ALI – CLE

CONDEMNATION 101: HOW TO PREPARE AND PRESENT AN EMINENT DOMAIN CASE

JANUARY 24-26, 2013

MIAMI BEACH, FLORIDA

Opening Statements in Eminent Domain Cases

Brandee L. Caswell
Faegre Baker Daniels, LLP
1700 Lincoln Street Ste. 3200
Denver, Colorado 80203-4532

Joseph P. Suntum
Miller, Miller & Canby
200-B Monroe Street
Rockville, Maryland 20850

I. OPENING STATEMENTS – AN OVERVIEW

The opening act in a trial—after the jury is seated and given introductory remarks by the trial judge—is the opening statement. And, although judges like to emphasize that opening statements “are not evidence” that admonition is both potentially inaccurate and unhelpful to a trial lawyer.¹ Inasmuch as the lawyer would like the jurors to keep an open mind and be receptive to the lawyer’s message, implicitly advising a jury that it can ignore what the lawyer is getting ready to say, because it “is not evidence” is unlikely to advance the lawyer’s goal. So, whether one believes the psychological literature suggesting jurors may begin forming opinions or even conclusions about the case during opening statements (which once set will be difficult to dislodge) there is no good reason to risk testing the hypothesis. Rather, a trial lawyer should use the opening, as every other part of the trial, to advance the theme and facts of the case.

As this is a national conference, it is important for all to recognize that the procedural and substantive rules applicable to trials and opening statements varies from state to state and federally. Consequently, whatever may be the rule or tradition in Colorado or Maryland, counsel should check the rules of your particular jurisdiction. For example, in Maryland, by Rule, the jury view of the property must take place before any evidence is presented. In Colorado the practice is to the contrary. The jury view can be undertaken at any point during the presentation of the case, but generally occurs either at some point during the presentation of the evidence or after all of the evidence has been presented.²

¹ There is authority to support the proposition that even though a lawyer’s statement in opening is not technically evidence, it may constitute a binding admission.

Likewise, in Maryland, the courts have been open to providing counsel two opening statements: the first to discuss the view and what the jurors will see and should seek to observe;³ and a second after the view is completed and the traditional trial is set to begin.

What is most important here is to learn how procedures vary in other jurisdictions in order to recognize when arguing for a change in your jurisdiction may be appropriate. While the trial judge may not grant a motion to alter historical practice, once raised and preserved, counsel may be able to “make new law” in your home jurisdictions by persuading the appellate court that the rationale of another State is persuasive.

II. PROCEDURAL ISSUES

The purpose of an opening statement is to help the fact finder understand the case to be tried and to inform the fact-finder in a general way of the nature of the action – in a condemnation case, usually that means telling them they have one issue to decide—Just Compensation. C.J.S. Trials § 161 Trial judges are allowed broad discretion in conducting the trial, which may be exercised to limit the length of opening statements and even, possibly, whether to allow opening statements at all. See Clark Advertising Agency v. Tice, 490 F.2d 834, 836-37 (5th Cir. 1974) (holding whether to allow an opening statement in federal court is within sound discretion of trial court); United States v. 5 Cases More or Less Containing “Fuglia Mia” Brand, 179 F.2d 519, 522 (2d Cir. 1950) cert. denied 339 U.S. 963 (same).

Generally, of course, opening statements are permitted with the introductory admonition to the jury—from the judge not the lawyer!—that what the lawyer says is not evidence, but a road map to explain what the case is about and what the evidence will be.

The first procedural issue is which party goes first. Here, again, the practice varies across the country. In Maryland the condemnor opens and closes both opening statements and closing arguments. In Colorado the practice is reversed. Colorado, apparently, reflects the majority practice. It may be instructive to review and consider the rationale behind each practice.

Many courts justify their practice by reference to the applicable burden of proof. The authorities across the country differ on the question of where lies the burden of proving the value of land in a case of eminent domain. 7 Nichols on Eminent Domain § 8.04[2] (3d ed.1989). See also 29A C.J.S. Eminent Domain § 271 (1965). A majority of jurisdictions hold that, if the sole issue at trial is the amount of money to be paid, the condemnee has the burden of proof and the right to open and close. Other jurisdictions accord the condemnor the right to open and close regardless of the issues presented, and burden of proof is not relevant. Still other jurisdictions place the burden of proving adequate compensation on the condemnor. In these jurisdictions, the landowner may offer countervailing evidence both as to the value of the land and the damages caused by the taking, but is not required to do so until the condemnor has met his or her burden of proving the value. See 5 Nichols § 18.5.

² In Colorado, the property view is mandatory for a trial by commissioners (three property owners who typically have some real estate knowledge and may include a retired judge) and is discretionary in jury trials.

³ Counsel may be prohibited from speaking to the jury at the view, so a pre-view opening statement is helpful to direct the jurors’ attention.

The Florida court’s discussion of the issue in City of Ft. Lauderdale v. Casino Realty, Inc., 313 So. 2d 649, 652-53 (Fla. 1975) illustrates the issues involved:

Compensation in condemnation proceedings in [Florida] includes both usual and unique items of damage. The burden of proof varies depending on the specific item of damage. The items of damage in a condemnation proceeding in this state and the party that has the burden of proof are set forth as follows:

Item of Damage	Party Who Has the Burden of Proof
1. Value of the land taken	Condemning authority
2. Damage to the land remaining or severance damages	Property owner
3. Special enhancement to remaining land by Improvement	Condemning authority
4. Moving expenses	Property owner
5. Business loss	Property owner

In many instances, the issue concerning the value of the land taken is nominal in comparison to the asserted claims for severance damages or business loss. Parker v. Armstrong, supra, illustrates one such situation. There, although the property owner had the burden of proving the substantial issue to be presented to the jury, the condemning authority had the privilege of opening and closing in final argument because it had the duty of going forward to establish initially what land was being taken and its value.

Thus, in Florida, which party has the burden of proof and, therefore, the right to open and close the case depends on what the “primary” issue is in the case.

In Illinois, the condemnor has the burden of proof and the right to open and close at all stages of the trial. Dept. of Bus. And Economic Dev. v. Brummel, 288 N.E.2d 392 (Ill. 1972). But, if the condemnee has filed a counterclaim for damages, the condemnee then has the right to proceed first at all stages of trial. See id. Failure to file a motion to requesting the right to proceed first at all stages in the trial can result in a waiver. See Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Danekas, 433 N.E.2d 736 (Ill. App. 3d 1982).

As further illustration, Maryland holds that the traditional concept of burden of proof is not applicable in a condemnation case. The Court extensively discussed the issue and the different traditions in Solko v. State Roads Comm'n of State Highway Admin., 82 Md. App. 137, 144-49, 570 A.2d 373, 376-79 (1990):

In their brief, the Solkos baldly claim that the trial court erred by refusing to instruct the jury that the burden of proof in a “quick-take” condemnation case is on the condemnor. They offer no direct support for this statement and arguably have waived it. Nonetheless, because this is an important issue which we have not previously addressed, we explain why we disagree with the Solkos.

First, the Solkos contend that the burden of proof of the value of the property taken is on the State since they have the right to open and close the case. In Harford Building Corp. v. City of Baltimore, 58 Md.App. 85, 90, 472 A.2d 479, cert. denied, 300 Md. 153, 476 A.2d 722 (1984), Judge Getty, formerly of this Court, quoted 1 Thompson on Trials, § 247:

“ ‘In a proceeding to condemn land for public uses and for the assessment of the compensation to be made to the landowner, the petitioner holds the affirmative of the issue, and consequently has the right to begin and reply, both in the introduction of evidence and in the argument to the jury.’ ”

Harford clearly established the State's position as opener and closer of condemnation proceedings as Rule U4 mandates. Rule U4 requires the designation of the party seeking condemnation as plaintiff and the persons having an interest in the property designated as defendants; hence, the condemnor has the right to open the case.³ In Harford, 58 Md.App. at 89, 472 A.2d 479, quoting Kenly v. Washington County Railroad Co., 129 Md. 1, 6, 98 A. 232 (1916), we restated the rule in Maryland:

“The landowner is passive until the company causes the warrant to issue; and the proceeding is always instituted to enable the company to take the land as well as to ascertain the amount of the damages to be paid to the owner. As the object is to take the land, the landowner cannot be said to have the burden of proof on him.’” (Emphasis in original.)

The State has and agrees that it has the burden of proving the necessity of taking and the public use to be made of the property. Initially, the State argues in its brief that, once it has shown the necessity for the taking for public use, the burden of showing damages is upon the property owner.⁴ The State cites Church v. State Roads Commission, 249 Md. 406, 413, 240 A.2d 255 (1968), for this proposition. The State's reliance on Church is not fully justified and is perhaps disingenuous since the State later concedes that neither party has the burden of proof regarding damages.

The authorities across the country differ on the question of where lies the burden of proving the value of land in a case of eminent domain.⁷ Nichols on Eminent Domain § 8.04[2] (3d ed.1989). See also 29A C.J.S. Eminent Domain § 271 (1965). A majority of jurisdictions hold that, if the sole issue at trial is the amount of money to be paid, the condemnee has the burden of proof and the right to open and close.⁵ Other jurisdictions, however, accord the condemnor the right to open and close regardless of the issues presented, and burden of proof is not relevant.⁶ Still other jurisdictions place the burden of proving adequate compensation on the condemnor.⁷ In these jurisdictions, the landowner may offer countervailing evidence both as to the value of the land and the damages caused by the taking, but is not required to do so until the condemnor has met his or her burden of proving the value. See 5 Nichols § 18.5.

We hold with a minority of jurisdictions that the usual burden of proof instruction as to value has no place in a condemnation case. Not only do we find the minority position better reasoned, but our case law in this area supports this result as well. Once the necessity for the taking has been established, the focus of the fact finder is upon “just compensation” which the State is required to pay for that taking. It matters not who bears the burden of proof as the concept has no place in the inquiry.

As stated by the Supreme Court of Alaska in State v. 45,621 Square Feet of Land, 475 P.2d 553, 555 (Alaska 1970), cited with approval in Patterson Redevelopment Agency v. Brenstock, 123 N.J.Super. 457, 303 A.2d 598, 599 (1973):

“In a condemnation proceeding * * * where the sole issue is determination of just compensation, procedural rules involving the concept of risk of failure to persuade are inapposite. Here the focal point of the trier of fact's inquiry is the ascertainment of just compensation. Thus, regardless of whether the condemning agency or the property owner meets a given burden of persuasion, Alaska's constitutional mandate requires that the owner be awarded just compensation for the property he has lost. In the usual condemnation case, the jury is confronted with conflicting opinions as to value. The jury is not faced with the necessity of finding a particular value or no value at all. As to the issue of fair market value, both the condemning agency and the property owners may produce competent evidence of the fair market value of the condemned property. Absent the production of such evidence by either party, the triers of fact will determine fair market value solely from the other party's evidence. The burden of production facet of burden of proof, rather than the risk of non-persuasion aspect, is the more meaningful concept in the trial of a condemnation proceeding.”⁸

Condemnation cases are fundamentally different from other kinds of cases where value is concerned. There is no “fact” which one party is attempting to show; rather, there are experts who provide testimony tending to give credence to the value each party has assigned to the property. That is not to say that no burden falls upon the condemnee. As a practical matter, however, he or she bears the burden of producing the information which demonstrates that the land taken is worth more than the condemnor has estimated, just as the Alaskan Court noted. But this is the burden of production, as the 45,621 Square Feet of Land Court noted.

The burden of production is well illustrated in our holding that, where landowners sought to establish themselves as displaced persons and thus eligible for payments, they had the burden of establishing that fact, Conrad v. Department of Natural Resources, 30 Md.App. 479, 493, 352 A.2d 904, cert. denied, 278 Md. 719 (1976), or where severance damages are separately and additionally sought, landowners are similarly given that burden, Brannon v. State Roads Commission, 305 Md. 793, 800, 506 A.2d 634 (1986). Similarly, in Church, the Court of Appeals held that, where the landowner contended the Board of Zoning Appeals should extend the nonconforming use or that the original zoning was erroneous, the landowner had the burden of establishing the contention. So far as value is concerned, the jury is free to arrive at its own evaluation, so long as there is evidence to support such an award. The State had conceded this and we agree. The jury uses its independent judgment regarding the weight of any facts before it; it is not bound to accept the judgment of any single witness. Greater Baltimore Consol. Wholesale Food Market Auth. v. Duvall, 255 Md. 90, 97, 256 A.2d 882 (1967). The Court of Appeals has held: “The jury may properly consider various elements that influence market value at the time of the taking in its determination of damages.” Dodson v. Anne Arundel County, 294 Md. 490, 495, 451 A.2d 317 (1982). The question of fair market value is ultimately an issue for the trier of fact. Colonial Pipeline Co. v. Gimbel, 54 Md.App. 32, 38, 456 A.2d 946, cert. denied, 296 Md. 110 (1983). If the landowners disagree with the State's estimate of the property's value, they need to produce evidence that the land is, in fact, worth more. The trial court's refusal to instruct the jury that the State has the burden of proof was not error; such an instruction would have constituted error had it been given.⁹

III. SUBSTANTIVE LEGAL ISSUES

A. Objections in Opening Statements & Appellate Review

Objections in opening statements are usually rare, but can be important from an appellate perspective. Constant objections in opening statements tend to annoy everyone because this is the jury's opportunity to hear an overview of the case and interruptions are a distraction. However, objections must be made to ensure the purposes of an opening statement are maintained. Kebr v. Smith Barney Harris Upham & Co., 736 F.2d 1283, 1286 (9th Cir. 1984) (non-condemnation case involving improper statements of counsel during opening and closing where no objections were lodged). If no objection is made, and misconduct continues throughout the course of trial and in closing statements, it will negatively impact your ability to argue error on appeal. Glenn v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 32 F.3d 1462, 1464 (10th Cir. 1994) (where no objection is made, appellate courts typically review for “plain error”); Sutkiewicz v.

Monroe County Sheriff, 110 F. 3d352, 361 (6th Cir. 1997) (conduct complained of on appeal must “permeate” the entire trial).

Further, absent proper objections, a trial court is not required to determine whether evidence in support of factual assertions in an opening statement will be admitted during trial. Melton v. Larrabee, 832 P.2d 1069, 1071 (Colo. App. 1992)..

B. Misconduct in Opening Statements

Misconduct in opening statements can occur in various ways. In addition to the overriding “rule” that one cannot argue in opening statement, there are additional prohibitions, and these are similar to what is prohibited in a closing argument.

For example, statements of fact concerning matters which are not admissible or not established by the evidence are grounds for a mistrial if prejudice denying the other party to a fair trial is the result. This often occurs via counsel referencing a fact which is the subject of an in limine order, or a fact which counsel cannot admit into evidence, such as a condemnor’s offer of compensation during the good faith negotiation process. See Ruth v. Dept. of Highways, 359 P.2d 1033, 1034 (Colo. 1961). (holding references to offers made as part of good faith negotiations or settlement are improper).

Referencing source of funds to pay the condemnation award is also prohibited. Case law is replete with examples in which condemnor’s counsel have tried to persuade a jury to make a smaller condemnation award by telling the jurors that their tax money will be used to pay the award. See, e.g., Denver Joint Stock Land Bd. v. Bd. of County Comm’rs, 98 P.2d 283, 285 (Colo. 1949) (ordering new trial where improper statement that “Any payment that you make to respondents in this case will come out of your own pockets” made in closing argument, curative instruction by court was inadequate).

Referencing the financial status of a party is also improper. See Commonwealth v. Davis, 400 S.W.2d 515 (Ky. App. 1966) (ordering a new trial where owner’s counsel appealed to passions and prejudices of jury during closing argument by referencing cost of condemnor’s lawyers and amount of taxes being collected by condemnor).

C. Remedies for Misconduct

If misconduct occurs during opening statements, the trial court may take a number of remedial actions. The court can admonish counsel (and may do so in the presence of the jury). The court may also provide an instruction to the jury to disregard the improper statement. Or, the court may provide (and counsel may request this) a curative instruction to the jury at the close of evidence. Weese v. Schukman, 98 F.3d 542, 551 n.6 (10th Cir. 1996); West v. Carson, 49 F.3d 433, 436 (8th Cir. 1995). The offending lawyer may want to solicit the curative instruction as a means to avoid a negative appellate outcome. Finally, the court may order (and again, counsel may seek) a mistrial.

IV. STRATEGIC ISSUES

A. Opening statement versus opening argument

The opening is counsel's first opportunity to present a full picture of the case from each perspective. Experienced counsel may disagree on whether the opening is an "argument" or merely a "statement" or roadmap to familiarize the jury with the evidence to be presented. But all counsel may agree that full advantage should be taken of "primacy, recency and frequency" to ensure that all important elements of your case are presented clearly to the jury in opening.

The debate over whether counsel may "argue" in opening statement is often one of semantics. What counsel should do is communicate his or her message as persuasively as possible. This requires clarity of thought, speech and message. It may also be advanced by an insistent or "argumentative" tone. The difference between what constitutes argument versus what is simply a statement of what the evidence will show is tone. And an objection or judge's admonishment not to "argue" may be overcome either by changing one's tone, or by adding the palliative phrase, "the evidence will show" or "we will prove," in the front of your statement. For example:

Owner's Counsel: "My client's property is more valuable than the government contends because it is in a recognized growth area and is well suited to be rezoned and developed as...."

Owner's Counsel: "The evidence will show that my client's property is more valuable than the government contends because it is in a recognized growth area and is well suited to be rezoned and developed as...."

Thoughtful counsel should consider the most persuasive way to communicate your message to the jury and if that requires a strong tone in places, counsel may evade objection or sanction by carefully introducing your indictment with the gate-opening phrase "We will prove...."

B. Tips for Orienting the Jury or Fact-finder

Opening statements are part of the art we practice. Because of this, there is no formulaic approach to an opening statement. The opening statement is a strategic opportunity to accomplish a number of goals, chief among them is to advance your theme of the case. However, we find there are a number of considerations one should keep in mind in preparing every opening statement.

First, thank the jurors immediately and sincerely. Their time is valuable and they would probably rather be somewhere else (and they have probably just spent considerable time in voir dire detailing other time commitments they have which they think are more pressing than this task).

Second, get them interested in what they are going to do and the importance of doing it. Sitting on a jury is an important task. Jurors are tasked with ensuring that a very important Constitutional right is upheld, so tell them that is their task. I often impress upon jurors that they are doing something important by telling them: “There are only two ways to participate directly in a democracy-voting and sitting on a jury.”

Third, clearly explain where the fight is and where it is not. Your fact-finder will want to understand what it is they are being asked to decide (or not decide as the case may be). They will also appreciate knowing where the fight really is. If the other side spends hours cross examining your expert about an issue that is not really in dispute, you can remind the fact-finder about that waste of time on closing argument.

Fourth, tell them what to think about or what to listen for when they hear the evidence. The fact-finder will not be able to distinguish the clutter from the important details unless they know what to listen for. Fifth, help them to not feel overwhelmed. After the jury selection process, jurors often feel overwhelmed, and this is before the trial has even really started. It is a very foreign process and they don't know what is coming next. You need to tell them and put them at ease.

Sixth, let them know that while this is important, it is not complicated. Underscore that it is not complicated, and understand it is your job to simplify the complex. If you can't explain the case to a perfect stranger in 5 minutes, you have not simplified it enough. Keep trying. Along these same lines, don't use legalese or terms of art unless you have to, and when you do, tell the fact-finder what those terms mean. Don't leave them guessing and don't talk above their heads.

Seventh, establish your credibility as the person with the answers, the person who has done the work and the person they should believe. Done correctly, each of the six items above will go a long way in helping you achieve this.

C. Setting up the Evidence

Make promises you can and will keep where the evidence is concerned. Fact-finders report that one of the primary ways lawyers gain credibility is making and keeping promises. Saying that “the evidence will show...” or “We will prove that” in opening statement means you really need to do it. If you don’t keep those promises you will lose credibility.

Don’t forget use this opportunity to tell a story—your client’s story. Researchers consistently report that jurors understand cases through storytelling. If you are the condemnee’s counsel, tell a compelling story about the land, your client, and what plans may have been disrupted by the government. If you are the condemnor’s counsel, tell the story of the project, its importance, and how this piece of property fits into the picture.

Condemnor’s counsel should consider telling the jury that the objective fair market valuation method requires the application of some legal fictions—some things they have to assume which may not be true. For instance, they have to assume property is for sale by a willing seller, they have to assume the condemnor is a willing buyer with no unusual need, they have to assume a date of valuation in the past—again these assumptions are for the purpose of applying the fair market valuation method (as opposed to a subjective award based on sympathy, anger or prejudice). This is not just some arbitrary game with strange rules, there is a sound reason behind the rules—fair market valuation.

D. Setting up the Closing

Some lawyers approach trial preparation by preparing their closing statement first. They consider carefully what they want to say in closing to the jury and this helps them identify the evidence they will need to present, which in turn helps formulate the opening argument which in turn will help the jury understand the issues and the evidence they will hear.

From a strategic viewpoint, you can use your opponent’s opening statement to your advantage. You should listen carefully to what “evidence” your opponent is most keen to point out and rely on. Keep a tally of what your opponent promises and then point out in closing argument anything that your opponent failed to deliver on when they presented their evidence. If you assume that your opponent is doing this to you too, you can better avoid mistakes that can cost you credibility. Regardless of how you prepare your case, you should give careful thought to the interplay between opening statement and closing argument.

V. CONCLUSION

Make full use of cardinal rules of persuasion to make your case as clear, memorable and persuasive as possible right from the outset: humanize the case, tell a story, use exhibits, simplify complex concepts, etc. In summary, the opening is counsel's opportunity to present the case in the best possible light and convince the jury that if you prove what you promise to prove that the only just and fair inquisition is the amount you request.

Joe Suntum is a Principal with Miller, Miller & Canby's Litigation Practice Group and focuses his practice in the areas of Eminent Domain, Real Estate Litigation, Appeals, and complex Commercial Litigation.. He can be reached at 301.762.5212 or JPSuntum@mmcanby.com.